Fortune's Football.

By IZOLA FORRESTER.

Copyright, 1904, by Izola Forrester.

Ramsdell rose from the table leis- have you arrested as a crank, or a urely. He did not feel excited or lunatic. What will you do with the nervous, merely speculative, as he had money?"

"Use it as fresh capital. I could been when he sat down. Between the time of sitting and the present moment was a difference of exactly forty ment was a difference of exactly forty three thousand, seven minutes, and three thousand, seven hundred and eight dollars. It was a I have no other security to give for small matter. During the forty min- the money." utes, the three thousand odd had fluctuated in splendid and most capricious proportions. At one time Ramsdell the liked grit, but being of an older generation, he also liked the spirit of a man who would not ask something believed it had become forty-six thousand dollars. That was when the red was winning. Now it was nothing, and Ramsdell rose with a curious as a wheat speculator, he had taken his note for fifty theorem. red was winning. Now it was nothing, and Ramsdell rose with a curious sense of relieved tension and specu-

There was a crowded semi-circle of faces back of his chair. He did not meet any of the eyes. There would be only pity or amusement in them. Not that he cared for public senti-ment! He simply did not want it at ward the palace. It would be quiet up there and he could think. There was much to think of. He had to think whether or not it should be his the had not be highly the had not be the had n last chance to think. As he left the lights and the music behind, he had an odd premonitory feeling of separation from it all, even the hotels and the railway station ahead of him was the castled steep of Monaco, beyond that the sea and the night, and beyond that the sea and the night, and beyond that the lifted instant their glances had met and the night, and beyond that the lifted instant their glances had met and the night and beyond that the sea and the night and beyond that the lifted instant their glances had met and the number of the night and not counted on Beata.

The second cigarette became an impossible half inch, and he threw it on the ground and lit a third.

He had not counted on Beata.

The second cigarette became an impossible half inch, and he threw it on the ground and lit a third.

He had no to counted on Beata.

"That is merely protection to you. Crittenden nodded appreciatively.

his note for fifty thousand.

Inside of a year Ramsdell had left Chicago with the remnants of twenty thousand. Fortune was elusive, and had played football with him. Sevpity or amusement in them, at he cared for public senti-He simply did not want it at least he knew that one face there is a same thing less than the senting less than the sent was not there.

It was cool and dark out of doors.

He stopped outside the Casino, lit a cigarette and took the promenade towere fewer temptations for living than on the home side.

He had not counted on Beata.

of Monaco, beyond that the sea and the night, and beyond that—he lifted his face to the stars and wondered.

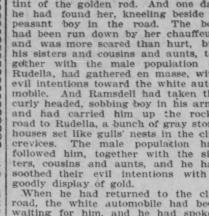

He was neither desperate nor morbid. Several times in his life when a crisis had come, he had found him—live a crisis had come, beyond that the sea and the mentary gampse, when for a single courage, and the opinion of the world he stepped from the entrance of the was still dear to him.

At the turn of the path, he stopped suddenly, and threw away the half-acrisis had come, he had found him—live a courage, and the opinion of the world had passed, taking the road to the suddenly, and threw away the half-acrisis had come, he had found him—live and the courage, and the opinion of the world had passed, taking the road to the suddenly, and threw away the half-acrisis had come, he had found him—live and the courage, and the opinion of the world had passed.

and was more seared than hurt, but his sisters and cousins and aunts, together with the male population of Rudella, had gathered en masse, with evil intentions toward the white automobile. And Ramsdell had taken the curly headed, sobbing boy in his arms and had carried him up the rocky road to Rudella, a bunch of gray stone houses to like gulls' nests in the cliff crevices. The male population had followed him, together with the sisters, cousins and aunts, and he had soothed their evil intentions with a an hour.

The promertade was deserted. Below it, the rocks jutted out like Titanic teeth of some beast of prey above the still waters of the Mediterranean. One could leap to them. Not here, when one could see the lights of the Casino, but beyond at the turn of the path, where the shrubbery of the path, where the shrubbery of goodly display of gold.

When he had returned to the cliff road, the white automobile had been waiting for him, and he had spoken with her, merely a few words of thanks, but it had been enough. In the days that followed he had wished devoutly that every peasant how on devoutly that every peasant boy on the Route de la Corniche could be bribed to take a tumble under the wheels of the white automobile.

And that had been all. She might have been an empress of the Orient for all the chance he had of meeting her, and yet in the few last days of her, and yet, in the few last days of hopeless, reckless staking on fortune's whim, her face had been always with him. In its lovely serenity he had found a peace that wooed him like a promise of forgetfulness of his own misery. So he had ridden to Mentone more frequently than the average Casino player, and to-night when the parting of the ways had come he found himself musing on the face of Beata O'Istria rather than on the fact that his word of honor demanded that that his word of honor demanded that he take a short cut to eternity within The promerade was deserted.

the palace gardens shut out the view. He wished it to appear at much as possible, an accident. Suicide carried with it a stigma of deficient moral courage, and the opinion of the world

He loosened the lad's colar and raised him self acting as two distinct person-alities. There was one who simply drifted on the tide of circumstance, and another who watched the drifting in a quiet, impersonal fashion, and was extremely sorry for the other fellow in a friendly way, but was not troubled concerning him. The worst that the tide could do was to lay him gently up on the short out of the way. He felt in his pocket and drew out cigarette case. There were five. He replaced them carefully. It a time when items mattered. He would smoke the five and think, and at the fifth, the tide would

Two years exactly had passed since he had seen Crittenden. He had gone to him in about the same spirit as he had sought the Casino to-night. There was a chance of a hundred to one that he might win. He had known the man slightly. Before the bottom had dropped out of the market that last day he had seen Crittenden Crittenden leaning comfortably against a pillar near the wheat pit, watching him. When it was over he had passed near the pillar, and Crittenden had put out his hand. Good fight, all right," he said,

It was not much of a straw to grasp at, but there was a look of in-terested sympathy and appreciation in his glance that coming from John Crittenden made it a whole hay Ramsdell had gone to him the next day with the proposition. It was not a sentimental one. Probably if it had would have left the office LaSalle street in five minutes. As it had told Crittenden nothing but the cold facts in the case. He was utterly ruined in the crash of May If he could have covered his margins and so held the market for groves.

another day, he might possibly have Ram won out. As it was, he was worse than penniless, and he wanted $50,000 from Crittenden. It was to be in the nature of a loan. He would insure his life for $70,000 in Crittenden's favor. The fact of Crittenden holding favor. The fact of Crittenden holding the note against him for $50,000 would cover the insurance regulations. The note was to be made payable at the end of two years. At the expiration of that time, if he failed to meet it, he gave his word of honor that he ould commit suicide Crittenden had heard him through

"I mean what I say," Ramsdell had remarked, after waiting for an answer. "I know that you do," had retorted "If I had any doubt, I'd gists. Knight's Pharmacy.

closely on a mass of fair hair, as rich in color as a clump of golden rod on an autumn prairie back home in Illi-

There was a continental repose and finish to her that placed a barrier of separation between her and the girls whom he had seen about the Casino and hotels. Her long automobile vell of white chiffon was lifted from her face, and as she passed, her dark eyes felt as if for a last moment, fate had had looked directly at him.

Clancy, Ward & Jaffray's European operator, had told him who she was Clancy's was the only familiar face he had seen since he left the boat at Marseilles.

She's beyond you, boy; way up, out of sight. Dog and the moon, moth and the flame, light of the star, and all that sort of thing. That is the Marchesa Beata D'Istria."

"Sounds solid and interesting," had nmented Ramsdell. "Where does the Marchesa live?"

"On the Riviere, beyond Mentone."
Clancy had bent to fleck the dust from his patent leathers with a narrow-hemmed linen handkerchief. "Villa D'Istria. Going ballooning after the Ramsdell had looked thoughtfully after the dust raised by the white automobile. Somehow its occupant had seemed above discussion with Clancy, and he had spoken curtly. "One may ride along the Riviera."

The trouble was he had ridden often. After one has passed the lemon and olive groves east of Monaco, there is the cliff road on to Mentone, and he beyond, where the hills dip to the blue of the sea, one may find the Villa D'Istria, white and stately in the silences of its rose walks and orange

Ramsdell had found it. Every day he had ridden over the cliff r watching for a glimpse of the with the dark eyes, and hair like the

A Good Night's Rest.

The greatest tonic on earth is a night's rest. Restless nights and the terrible exhaustion of a hacking cough are dread dangers of the poor consumptive. But why this fear of the night when a few doses of Dr. Boschee's German Syrup will insure re-freshing sleep, entirely free from cough or night sweat? Free expectoration in the morning is made certain by taking German Syrup. It has cured consumption for forty years. Trial bot-tle, 25c. Big bottle, 75c. At all drug-

It was not a moment for introduc-ions. Ramsdell caught the figure from behind. It swung around, and he got a swift, well-set blow in the jaw for his pains, and a curse that was a cry of veritable agony.

The struggle was a blessed relief to he tension of the past hours. As he given that other personality into his hands to settle old scores with. When he had finished, the man lay limp and motionless on the ground. He was young and in evening dress. As Ramsdell looked down at the pale upturned face with its fair, curling hair, and clear-cut profile, he felt satisfied that the other personality was at least that of a gentleman, according to certain canons. He loosened the lad's collar and raised him.

"Are you able to walk?" he asked. The other spoke in French, curtly. "Leave me here."

For answer Ramsdell produced a flask of brandy, and compelled him to drink from it. With resolute, compressed lips, and eyes in which a gleam of amusement shone, over the latest nersault of circumstances, he h somersault of circumstances, he helped the man to rise. In less than half an hour the two faced each other in Ramsdell's room at the Hotel de Paris, and it still lacked twenty minutes of

The stranger was nervous and unstrung. He sat in a chair beside the table, his head resting on his hands.
"It would have been over by now," he said slowly. "Why did you stop said slowly.

me? Ramsdell watched quizzically. Somehow he felt as if a crisis had been passed safely. When he turned to the passed safely. When he turned to the dresser and found a box of cigarettes which he had left there, he smiled. The tide of being had refused to be gauged or limited by the burning of five cigarettes. It still flowed on, and Ramsdell lit a sixth one from the fresh box. "I did it because you were usurping my place."

my place."
"You, too?" There was a flash of fellowship in the glance of the other. He leaned forward eagerly.

Ramsdell hesitated. It was hard to elect any definite reason.

Beata's gaze waved. There no conquetry in her manner, only Ramsdell thought of Beats. "I should say not."

tint of the golden rod. And one day he had found her, kneeling beside a peasant boy in the road. The boy had been run down by her chauffeur,

The boy was certainly in deeper trouble than himself. "Le tapls vert?" he asked.
"To the very end of all. And if I could have staked my life, it would have gone also. But that is not all, m'sieur." He spoke more quietly, with a kind of hopeless awe at the ruin he had accomplished. "I am than ruined. I am dishonored. was not my money. I have made her penniless, too. I wish to die before to-morrow, when she will know."

"Does she love you?"

"I am all that she loves in the world,"

"Then you are twice a fool," Ramsdell calmly. "I am only one. You take your own life from yourself before you have fulfilled your time. It's a bad thing to give up when to-morrow holds the cards. Every morning brings a fresh deal, and the game's never done until death rakes a life that was dearest on earth to another."

"There was nothing left to cover the dishonor except death."
"My dear boy, do you smoke? No?
Then you should. It is quieting to the nerves. Death does not cover dishonor. Pardon me, but you take the continental view. It is simply a measure of escape for the offender beyond the laugh of the world, and possible punishment."

Ramsdell was standing near the door, one hand in his pocket, the other holding the cigarette lightly. He felt a sudden earnestness enthuse him. He was convincing himself as well as the other poor devil of the folly of their

"And you say that she loves you. You are very young. As long as you are sure of a woman's love, there is hope. She will forgive you anything." There was a rap on the door. Ramsdell asked who was there. One of the hotel attendants answered. Was Monsieur le Marquis within? He had been seen to enter with Monsieur Ramsdell. Visitors wished to see Ramsdell opened the door and stood speechless. Before him in the corridor were the Marchesa Beata D'Istria and John R. Crittenden of Chicago. Crittenden spoke first.

"Kirke Ramsdell, by George!"
Ramsdell gripped the extended hand mechanically. He was staring at the girl in amazement. She was in evening dress, an exquisite costume in evening dress, an exquisite costume of amethyst-colored chiffon and satin, whose material beauty was as elusive as the charm of her lovely face. For the first time in his life Ramsdell realized the spiritual significance of a woman's dress, a dress than could be so utterly an expression of her own individuality, as to be hexend descripindividuality as to be beyond description. In the curls of her fair hair was an orchid, its petals amethyst-colored, its heart a deep Jacqueminot red. Her eyes met his in startled appeal and cognition. 'Where is Andrea?'' she asked instantly.

Ramsdell turned to his guest. The latter had risen from the table at the opening of the door, and as the Marchesa spoke, he held out his arms to Ramsdell looked away. It was not a pleasurable moment for him. Crittenden had laid aside his hat and cane, and was eyeing him with considerable satisfaction.

"I'm mighty glad to see that you're O. K. I missed the Saturday boat to Marseilles, and had to come by way of Cherbourg. It has made me late."

"I am also late." Ramsdell spoke with an effort. "It is after midnight, and I'm not dead yet."
"Thank God, that you're not, my with an effort. "It is after midnight, and I'm not dead yet."

"Thank God, that you're not, my boy," said Crittenden, cheerfully. He looked at his watch. "You're off on your time. It is three minutes to twelve. Don't be in a hurry. Ramstell I've had an inside track on your silver surmounted by a tiny squirred to silver handles. The egg spoon is another one of the long, oval bowls, while the soup spoon of the hour is nothing but last season's bouillon spoon enlarged.

The newest nut pick has a bar of twelve, and in the end he had said "yes" very prettily and sweetly.

Then he had begun to think what his mother and sisters would say. It would make no difference so far as the day, as she stopped laughing from sheer exhaustion. "It was all my fault. dell, I've had an inside track on your affairs for two years. It was a business deal, of course, but I happen to have such a thing as a conscience, and it has troubled me to be a party to a scheme where a man's life was balanced against a mere matter of dollars and cents. When you sank that last twenty thousand in winter wheat, I was the winner. I didn't think that you would settle up, under the circumstances, but you did, and it was a pretty decent thing to do. I was all to the good along there, and I took the liberty of placing that twenty thousand in with my own operations for the spring. My boy, we squeezed them to the wall until they very much out of a cash balance of over six hundred thousand."

"And you came over here to tell "Partly. Partly on account of the oungsters over there. I suppose decent, exclusive corner in which to blow out his brains. Oh, he's a cheerful cub. I shall take him back with me this time, and marry him off to some clever, level-headed American girl who will talk sense into him. We were told he was up here, but I had no idea you two had fallen in together.'

'The company of misery," laughed Ramsdell. "I never saw him before in my life."

"Well, by George, that is funny," exclaimed Crittenden. "Didn't know there was a strain of the warranted not-to-fade-in-the-wash European blue blood in our old Chicago line, eh? My sister, Polly Crittenden, married the Marchese D'Istria There's the result, Andrea and Beata, Their parents are dead, and they nearly break their necks trying to live up to the traditions of their fore-fathers over here. But when they get hard up for cold cash and good advice, they remember their foren ers back in Chicago, and cable Uncle Jack to come over and fix matters up. Andrea manages to run wild over here, but I keep the bulk of Polly's money stored home where the frost won't nip it. Isn't that about right, girlie?

And Io! Beata, the unapproachable, Clancy's star, etc., blushed and dimpled, and looked as adorably lovable and human as any of her American foremothers.

"I think that we'll call that other affair settled," said Ramsdell, deliberately. "Thank you."
"We will," responded Crittenden heartily. "Don't mention it. Beata, Mr. Ramsdell will sail for home when we go next month, and until then I'd like him up at the villa for safe-keeping.

ders.

For the third time their glances met. To Ramsdell, it was a crucial moment. The amethyst-colored orchid had fallen at her feet when Andrea had caught her in his arms. As Rams-dell looked into her eyes he wondered if she knew what a month at Villa D'Istria meant to him. Crittenden was talking to Andrea, his hands resting on the boy's shoul-thas cured "And you—you yourself—you did had loved on the Riviera." Trial bot- not desire it?" "Come," she said softly, and Rams-dell bent, and raised the amethyst l orchid to his lips.

Flat Silverware Shows New Shapes

He who would be considered up to date in table etiquette will do well to cultivate a broad and comprehensive acquaintance with the gold and silversmith's art. The demand for culinary novelties and the constantly growing tendency toward daintiness of service, has brought into existence a bewildering array of knives, forks and spoons, and the modern chest of flat sterling silver is a veritable Chinese puzzle to the uninitiated.

When the knives and forks essential to an elaborate course dinner are laid forth to right and left of the service plate, the array is sufficient to stike terror to the heart of the inexperienced diner-out. In spite of the high favor in which the old family chest of silver is held, there is no chest of silver is held, there is no doubt that fashions in flat silver change almost every year, and the fad-dish woman tries to keep pace with them, buying at least one new service

The most striking change this year is the growing depth of the bowls in all spoons, the shallow bowl having practically disappeared. Bowls are also rounder than they have been in several seasons.

new Colonial pattern with the chaste and elegant beading. The second is called the new English pattern, and inside the plain edge of the handle runs a fine etching in scallops, giving a leaf-like effect. Both of these patterns show the highly polished or satin finish. The third pattern is the orchid, in French gray silver, several shades lighter than the oxidized ware. This is ornate and extremely pensive, but exquisite in workmanship.

The up-to-date dinner knife has a steel blade five inches long, with a three-inch handle in the pattern to match the rest of the service. The blade of the breakfast knife, also in steel, is four and a half inches long. The fish knife has a silver blade with The fish knife has a silver blade with a sharp point, and is next in size to the breakfast knife. The game knife has a pointed steel blade, and is fully as long as the breakfast knife. The next knife is size is the fruit knife, all in gilver, with plain or saw edge and a pointed blade. The butter spreader is the smallest of all, and takes the form of a rounded scimitar. Of the making of forks there seems to be no end, for it is one of the fads of the hour to eat almost everything of the hour to eat almost everything with a fork and dispense as far as possible with spoons. The newest dinner fork is large, and has five bowldinner fork is large, and has live bowning tines. The fork for terrapin, ragout or sweetbreads has a short spoon-like bowl with three short, flat tines. The fish fork has three tines and is smaller than the dinner fork.
The salad fork is about the same size, The salad fork is about the same size, and has three tines, but is distinguished by the tines being of gold. The berry fork, one of the daintiest novelties of the season, has three tines an inch and a half long attached to a short handle. The correct utensil for eating ice cream is a cross between fork and spoon, showing a short, rounded bowl with three short tines. This closely resembles the ragout fork, being distinguished by the gold. fork, being distinguished by the gold

The new chocolate spoon will ap-The new chocolate spoon will appeal most strongly to the feminine mind. It has a small round bowl, rather deep, which looks not unlike an exaggerated salt spoon. The handle may be long or short, according to the taste of the buyer. The latest orange spoons look like golden tulip leaves of exaggerated length attached leaves of exaggerated length attached silver surmounted by a tiny squirrel in the finest of the silversmith's art.

20th Century Eve and Her Mirror

Eve's pool could not have lent more charm to her fair form than do the mirrors of the present day to the woman who would study her own features. The old-time mirror with its disfiguring, sallow reflections is de-cidedly a thing of the past, and its successor of clear, brilliant, beveled glass is almost a flattering photosqueezed them to the wall until they yelled. I've got my twenty thousand back, and if you want to cancel that old debt inside of a minute and a half, I don't believe you'll miss it so very much out of a cash balance of years and the simple way to ascertain its depth is to place a pencil upon it. The space to place a pencil upon it. The space between the pencil's point and its im-age shows the depth of the glass. Miladi Millionaire has the doors of youngsters over there. I suppose her dressing-room paneled with the finest plate mirror so that she may again, yes? He tries it every time he know there is not a frill to give her gets into hot water. Last time Beata an ungraceful curve or a lock to spoil and I found him in Paris hunting a the contour of her coffure. For her who is not so fortunate. oval cheval glass or the triplicate mirror is a very satisfactory substitute. No woman who wishes to appear her prettiest should dress without the aid

There's Health

-in-

Various experiments by eminent scientists have proven the great value of lemons in destroying the germs of typhold fevers. Germs of diseases are deposited in the system by the failure of the bowels to act regularly. MOZLEY'S LEMON ELIX-IR is an ideal laxative, made from the juice of pure lemons, and has no equal for cleansing the system of all impurities. It acts promptly on the bowcis, liver and kidneys, and does not gripe or cause any unpleasar 50 cents per bottle at all drug stores.

LEMON HOT DROPS

CURE ALL COUGHS AND COLDS.

MOZLEY'S

MADE OF LEMONS.

SPENCER'S MONOMANIA

By LUCY HAMMERSLEY.

sently.

"Trusting that this will not shock, you too greatly, I remain your loving son, Got that?" he asked.

Miss Murphy nodded. "Well, I'll sign it now," he said, as he tilted back the typewriter carriage and penciled his initials upon the sheet. "I must get the rest of this stuff up to the postoffice to catch the New York mail sure. Then when I come back we'll go out on the lake."

"You forgot," interrupted Miss Murphy, "that I have those letters to get off for that Chicago man."

"That Chicago man is altogether too communicative," growled Livingston. "I can't say that I blame him. I used to write lots of letters I didn't "I know," said Miss Murphy, wick-edly. "I felt like urging you to dic-tate from some book when I saw you cudgling your brains for more things to say in your letters." Then she went back to her work. Livingston Spencer was also rounder than they have been in several seasons.

Three designs are in high favor for complete sets. One of these is a new Colonial pattern with the chaster is about to upset all her cherries. ished plans, even when he has the val-uable assistance of the sweetest little woman in the world. When he had

"Oh, yes, there is," retorted Prentiss. "You see, my boy, you are suffering from a rare form of dementia. You have a belief that you are going to marry both Miss Murphy and Miss Carruthers." "But I don't even know any Miss Carruthers." insisted Livingston. The physician drew from his pocket a cable form. "Read that," he said shortly. It ran:

"Please see Livingston, Grenvale. He thinks he is going to marry a Miss Carruthers and a typewriter. Must be "Nonsense," replied Livingston.

"Did my mother send you down here to prevent my marriage?"
"Which one?" asked the doctor ab-

"Which one?" shrieked Spencer,

"There isn't any other," protested

"What in time do you mean?"
"Why, the typewriter or the other?"

insane.' It was signed with his mother's "See here, doctor," he said as quietly as he could, "I am going to marry Edna Murphy. Just her! Nobody else!"

"Well," said the physician, " am glad that you have come to your senses at last."

Livingston flung himself out of the room and went in search of Edna, to whom he coursed evident and the search of t whom he poured out all his trouble. To his dismay, instead of sympathizcome to Glenvale in the early summer, he had been wonderfully attracted to the public stenographer. He had written scores of unnecessary letters that whom he course out all his trouble. To his dismay, instead of sympathizing with him, she laughed till the tears ran down her cheeks.

"It's too funny," she panted, as her

"It's too funny," she panted, as her

The physician drew from his pocket a cable form. "Read that," he said.

would make no difference so far as the engagement was concerned, but they would make it very unpleasant for would make it very unpleasant for Edna, and he was determined to protect her feelings.

The letter to his mother was followed by one to his elder sister, Grace. She had always stood by him, and he knew just how to word the letter to her. Grace was abroad with her mother, and he needed her moral backing and persuasive powers at this critical mo For a week he lived on in his dream of happiness, and then came Dr. Prentiss, their family physician, who was clearly ill at ease, but alert and watchful. For several days the doctor inpassiveness, broke all bounds.

"See here, doctor," he said stoutly,
"I want to know what all this means? You follow me about as though I were under your care, and sometimes you treat me almost like a child. What's the matter?'

"It's nothing, Livingston," protested the physician stoutly. "I needed a lit-tle rest, and came down here to get it with you."

whose two sides are alike, and their relation to each other is most impor-tant. These triplicate mirrors are now within the reach of every one, glasses eight inches square with quaint Dutch designs on the back being sold for 37 cents. In the larger sizes, these mirrors have settings to match any furniture, but they seem expectly brilliant in a framework of

The vanity mirror, which is just large enough to take in the eyes and nose, is the novelty of the season for the dressing table and the opera bag, and delightfully artistic are its manifold settings. A crescent shape has a back of porcelain, showing Cleopatra heads against a changeable crimson background, and in the curve of the crescent is perched a child in dulgilt. On the porcelain backs of the circular and fan shapes, appear idealized heads of girls in a framework of dull gilt tulips, and one which is particularly fetching shows that charming picture in miniature of Mme, de Stahl and her daughter. These tiny mirrors have either long or ring handles. The vanity mirror, which is just Revolving glasses, with a plain mirror on one side and magnifying mirror on the other, are set high in nickel frames which have holders for a candle on either side of the glass, grooves for the eyebrow and make-up brushes, or the shaving stick and brush, and below these, receptacles for cold cream jars and powder puff or for the razor and shaving mug.

Standing mirrors for the dressing table have elegant and costly frames of silver filigree, square and heart shaped, or if crimson velvet as a background for coils of silver. One oblong mirror, a foot and a half high and seven inches wide has an inch-wide frame of plain flat silver, and is sold frame of plain flat silver, and is for $18. Another and less expensive article shows a tall woman's figure, article shows an outstretched arm supporting the glass, while the clinging drapery of the skirt sweeps around the feet and under the mirror. Circular hand glasses are built with tapestry backs having a miniature of porcelain in the center. The old-fashioned, oblong if she lives, will be in line again in the center. center. The old-fashioned, oblong if she i eagle wings.

WOMEN AND THE RACE TRACK.

exhaustion. "It was all my fault. Edna Murphy was one of the girls I met while taking a business course. Father insisted upon my having a profession or trade, and I learned type-writing and shorthand. When Edna was taken ill after having secured this place, I persuaded him that it would be good practice and experience for me to take her name and position. I pay her the money I get, and I've been having a lovely time. When I wrote to your mother I did not take your dictation literally, but substituted my own name for the one under which I have passed all summer. You wrote your sister about 'Edna Murphy' and did not tell me. Can you blame them for being upset?"

want you. I've always said I'd never marry for money, and if you're John

Carruthers' daughter, you're worth

"Until you become Mrs. Spene Then he went in to send the dootor

Very well, then, I'll remain Edna.

"And to think," he said with twinkling eyes, "that I am engaged to be married to Edna Murphy, when I especially brilliant in a framework of ebony or nickel. One handsome back is of French gilt with embors "Before the middle of the season was reached she had dropped $25,000, which her husband made good. He had been fairly fortunate, but so great was his

(Continued from Page Twenty-four.) "The woman began to lose steadily. She had a system by which she thought she could surely win, but her nerve left her as hard luck pursued her, and it was soon an extraordinary thing for her to cash a bet."

"His wife continued her operations on the track with verying success. Her eldest son tried to dissuade her, but it was no use. The mother still had the gambling fever, and worse than ever. "Her daughter soon ran away from home, went on the stage, and then disappeared, never to be heard from again. Her eldest son died of heart disease and his brother shipped before the mast. "Not a day since then has the old woman failed to come to the track. She pawned everything, and last she was compelled to work in a cheap restaurant in Brooklyn.

"She showed up at Aqueduct on the first day last spring and began by betting a dollar. Luck was with her, and when Hermis won the Suburban she had rolled up a bank account of

with a back of rich red porcelain surmounted by dull gilt figures, and held by a long gilt handle headed with should be put on racetrack speculation